

Conclusion

From what I observed during my inclusion in this case, I have hope for Client's ongoing treatment, and a great deal of trust in the clinician assigned to the case. Due to the complex nature of childhood sexual assault and the resulting post-traumatic stress disorder caused, including the more focused interpersonal and cognitive concerns faced by Client, treatment will undoubtedly take longer than the average expectancy of TF-CBT. However, due to Client's willingness to learn emotion regulation skills, Caregivers' inclusion in treatment and psycho-education components, and the supervision by several trained Child Trauma Psychologists, I believe that Client will one day gain power over their lasting PTSD symptoms, and learn important interpersonal skills for further interaction with peers and the greater world. A case can never be viewed as simply the sum of its parts, but rather must be examined with a critical and caring eye. It is important to remember that the person being discussed is real and facing these issues each day, and must be treated as a human being, rather than a problem to be solved. If Client is regarded with the same level of respect that I have witnessed in my time shadowing this case, I have no doubt their treatment will succeed, and they will learn invaluable life skills for their future.
