

Trauma-Focused Cognitive Behavioral Therapy in Adolescent PTSD Treatment

Context

I was placed at the Quin Curtis Center (QCC) at WVU in Morgantown, WV for my field placement experience. I worked an average of ten hours per week in the front office, answering calls from clients and physicians. My usual tasks were to manage client files and allow clients access into the clinic for scheduled appointments. I was also tasked with helping the clinicians borrow assessment kits and various office materials for their appointments or training. I was also tasked with running pre-screener calls, which are the initial questions a client is asked before being accepted for services at the clinic.

During my time at the QCC, I was assigned to the clinical team of Dr Roley-Roberts, a child-focused licensed clinician with several student clinicians under her supervision. I attended weekly case-review sessions, where student clinicians would discuss their cases and get feedback from a mid-level supervisor and Dr Roley-Roberts herself. During these meetings, I took confidential notes of the progress each clinician was making with their respective clients, so I could better understand the role the team played within the clinic.
