

Critical Evaluation

During the course of shadowing, I found that Client began to show more interest and focus toward treatment. The trust between the clinician and Client became stronger each session, with Client asking questions about social skills unprompted, and admitting confusion towards interpersonal relations. Emotion regulation practices were initially ignored by Client, and many times during session Client would attempt to distract the clinician from the skills practice. However, as more sessions were observed, Client became more understanding of the benefit of these practices, and reported frequent use of Deep Breathing and the 5-4-3-2-1 Method of relaxation. Once the clinician used a method more focused on positive reinforcement of completion during session practices, Client became interested in completing all activities, as well as more willing to work with the clinician during the session.

Caregiver Evaluation

During the course of shadowing, I observed Caregivers interact with the clinician following Client's scheduled session. Typically, these sessions began with Caregivers asking the clinician what had been completed during session, before discussing any current frustrations or concerns they had in regards to Client. As sessions continued, Caregivers began to show more trust in the clinician's efforts, and became more willing to aid Client in homework completion.
